CERN opts for OpenFlow for SDN capabilities

August 3, 2015 | By Chris Talbot

Software-defined networking – and OpenFlow, in particular – got a boost last week when CERN signed a deal to have Brocade to help create a long-term SDN strategy. So in some ways, SDN will now lend a hand in solving the mysteries of the universe. Through the deal, Brocade has become a member of the CERN OpenLab, a 14-year-old partnership between CERN and IT vendors, including Cisco, Intel, Rackspace and Seagate. The goal of the Brocade-based SDN strategy is to boost network performance at CERN, particularly for those brilliant minds working with the Large Hadron Collider. More.
